Millions of people worldwide are on the move, many who are leaving their country of origin through choice and planning in order to secure a better future for their families. But many others seek to flee their homes due to extreme poverty, climate emergencies, geo-political crises, religious or racial persecution, and other complex reasons. In this lecture series, our speakers will share their expertise and specific areas of research about some of the root causes, impacts, policies, benefits, and responses to the global human migration phenomenon. It promises to be a thought provoking and compelling series of lectures that can help us better understand this complex issue, as it impacts our local communities and other parts of the world.
